Sunscreen & Your Skin

Tips from a professional holistic skin coach.

Does your skin go red using some sunscreens?

You may have sensitive skin and may be using the chemical type sunscreen. There are two general types of sunscreen, chemical and physical. Both are commonplace and work differently.

The chemical types are absorbed into the skin, so if you have sensitive skin, are more likely to cause you issues. The physical types sit on top of the skin creating a barrier that reflect light away – you'll recognise these as the heavier, sticky feeling creams like zinc. To determine which are the physical types, look for the main active ingredients of zinc oxide or titanium oxide – and use these to avoid sensitivity and redness. It's important to ensure you remove these at the end of the day.

Separately to the above, always choose a UVA, UVB and broad-spectrum sunscreen.

And lastly a note on skin moisturisers with UV – they won't be strong enough if you're out boating – so ensure you reapply every two hours.
